She went out little if ever. In the autumn she toured abroad, returning in a blaze of sartorial glory. Alsop met her at the pier, took one glance at her (she was smoking a cigarette on the deck of the liner as it docked, a scandal in those days), drew her aside and delivered a curtain lecture.
On December 2 Mrs. Alsop was again in a sanitarium. She faded from the news pages until October 31, 1913, when she was arrested in New York for refusing to pay a taxi fare. She created a scene in a police station and was bailed by Alsop with difficulty. This was the last public indication of how things were going between the Alsops until divorce proceedings were entered in a Pittsburgh court by the reluctant husband. Meanwhile, Mrs. Alsop had tried the stage as a danseuse, had been in the fashion notes, had bobbed up for two and three line mentions, and had apparently gotten the "New York idea" fixed in her head. Apparently, it has not been eradicated by the years follow-
